Klerksdorp Ball

The Klerksdorp Ball is a funky piece that was dug up in South Africa. One look on wikipedia and you will hear the skeptical voice of our world. Other than that, the rest of its story is up for speculation. Access the Akashic is not a place for speculation but for serious occult study and purpose. A meat-free diet, ages old magical practices and specific exercises are among the basics of the entrance into the ability to see stuff from the past as if it was happening right now. You will see...as we go along.

The hiatus was necessary. And now we have a format that features one item, but more slowly and with introspection. That means less interference. But you have seen what Access the Akashic is capable of, and now we as a group of investigators, continue on the quest for Akashic Wisdom.

The Klerksdorp Ball (the one shown above is the one that has been “accessed” for this reading) has been read (clairvoyantly) by the author twice at least. Just today, another reading was done and it coincides with the previous. This is important and as you will see it also coincides with previous readings about the late, great history of the Planet Mars, one which will only be seen through eyes of the inner, subtle astral records contained in the mass directly above our minds. According to the reading and not internet or other sources, the ball is approximately six million years old. According to the clairvoyance, both times, people who came from Mars used this ball as a spectator sport or game. To be plain, it was a sport with the goal of seeing who could roll the ball the furthest. One of the reasons it is steel is because that gave it some weight and thus it was challenging. This raises many questions as do all readings and there is never an end to the knowledge one can gain by this practice, although it is best to round the corners and get the basics fully covered before answering specific, harder-to-pinpoint answers.

You can see there is a place for an attachment on the ball. There was something that wrapped around the contestant's arm so that they could lunge the ball out onto the playing field. The participants were the King's guards. The author believes they called the game something akin to "IKAHr." They would bring this game from Mars to this planet. The King, his right hand man and the princess would watch. They lived on a rig and they had life suits on. The competition was only to see who could win and find out who is the best. It gave them something fun and competitive to do. They found it an amazing sport to watch. A very big strong guy was one of the throwers who would latch the ball onto the arm band and spin and throw it. The author received a sense that they were good and honest people who would simply enjoy a sport to watch with each other. The Queen was referee. There was a countdown before playing. If one of the people lost, they would feel rejected and walk away a loser. It made them merry, jovial and brought excitement to their lives while here. There was another man who was the coordinator who would set up the playing field with all its boundaries. A day would come when he would approach the king and say, "Do you want to play?"

But what were they doing on Earth? This is back when Mars was still an active place with the people there. They went to Earth and to our Moon. They traveled in highly evolved technology unlike ours of today. They may have actually been looking for a safe haven refuge because of the wars back on their planet. That's a long, long, long, long, long, long story. Thank you for reading.
